Structure elucidation is the process of determining the chemical structure of an unknown organic compound. It often involves the use of nuclear magnetic resonance spectroscopy (NMR spectroscopy), mass spectrometry and infrared spectroscopy. NMR spectroscopy plays a very important role in structure elucidation.

Classical structure elucidation prior to the development of these techniques (around 1960) was quite challenging, and required tremendous effort and time even for small organic molecules (MW < 500). The structures shown in Figure 1 are classical natural products which illustrate the difficulty of structure elucidation without the techniques mentioned above.
