Many thinkers outside of philosophy in different fields were part of structuralism or used structuralist notions. If some figures of structuralism like Claude Lévi-Strauss or Michel Foucault have for the first one a philosophy background, for the second an undeniable practice, in the specific case of Jacques Lacan, I don't see it.

Jacques Lacan: An Introduction to Lacanian Psychoanalysis ...

Maritain's introduction to philosophy is well-written and profoundly informative. He writes from the Thomistic perspective, which leads him to emphasize ontology more heavily than epistemology. This is refreshing in a literature that is awash in epistemic-centered studies (helpful as that approach may be).
