The documentation of the ls command answers these questions. On most unix variants, look up the ls man page (man ls or online). On Linux, look up the Info documentation (info ls) or online.The letter s denotes that the setuid (or setgid, depending on the column) bit is set. When an executable is setuid, it runs as the user who owns the executable file instead of the user who invoked the program.

What's the difference between "s" and "S" in ls -la?

Using the output of ls to get filenames is a bad idea.It can lead to malfunctioning and even dangerous scripts. This is because a filename can contain any character except / and the nullcharacter, and ls does not use either of those characters as delimiters, so if a filename has a space or a newline, you will get unexpected results.. There are two very good ways of iterating over files.
